The young man had bought along two covered wagons. In them the new comers finished their travels. Wasting no time in idle repinings, Henderson buckled manfully to his task, In less than four years he and his sturdy boys had established themselves so well that they were able to buy a big tract of government land in Fayette county, in the northeasternmost corner of lows, and there they settled and spread out, after genuine American pioneer fashion. They named their new home Pleasant Prarie, but their neighbors wouldn't have it so. They renamed it Menderson's Prairie, and so it is known

> It would be hard to conceive of a busier boy's life than that of David B. Henderson in the log home built by his father. The whole country abounded with wild game and the streams were full of fish, but the young ster had no time to hunt or play the angler. His only amusements were athletics and he was champion wrestler of the entire region. Through this the course of his life was changed almost as completely as the episode with the dead Earl of Buchan's younger brother had changed the circumstance of his father.

HOW HE WENT TO COLLEGE. It came about in this way : When the youngster was sixteen or seven teen a stranger who had heard of Henderson's Prairie for the purpose all precedent to give an opponent such an advantage, the left hand going with the under and the righ hand with the upper hold, but Hen derson consented, and, after a long struggle, the stranger got the " trip lock," the boy was thrown, his righ wrist being dislocated and one of the bones of the forearm broken. The doctor called to look after the injury failed to discover the fracture. The fracture healed slowly, and young Henderson was sent to Rockford,

Though he enjoyed student life at Fayette immensely, he did not finish the course of study there. It was interrupted by the civil war. Oue of his best friends was a student named W. W. Warner. In August, 1861, while the war was still young, Henderson and Warner spent a Sunday evening with Warner's sisters. Later in the night Henderson told five children by their hands and led Warner he was ashamed of himself them to a woman's lodge room to get because he had not enlisted as a volunteer in the army of the north. It ter John and his wife got home he wishwould be a pity to leave school, he said, but the country needed young men just then. The friends talked ong and earnestly over the situation and the result was a plan the culmination of which occurred at Fayette to pacify five children than one woman. on September 15. Henderson was then twenty-one.

On the morning of that day, just af er prayers, young Henderson, who, with Warner and another student named Burr, had been working quietly among the students at their "conspiracy," arose and asked permission to say a few words "on a subject of vital interest to every one present." He had no complaint, no protest to make, he said, but he wished earnestly to be heard. This was an entirely novel proposition, and the faculty hesitated, but per-mission was finally given. Then the youngster stood upon the floor and made his first "war speech." He dwelt upon the government's need for the services of its strong young sons, and declared it to be the duty of all who could to rush to the front His effort culminated in a whirlwind of passion and patriotism, and when he had finished he read a series of resolutions setting forth the situation in sober phrase, and concluding with this paragraph :

"We therefore drop our books to fight our country's battles." To this was appended a muster rolls bearing the names of twenty-two students, the flower of the school's student body. Before he went to the front Henderson enlisted 104 more volunteers. and thus the career of this typical American soldier, professional man and stateman was begun. His war record is known to all the world. Though offered a captain's place, he said he was too young, and so was made second lieutenant. Twice he was wounded, once in the face, when he was first under fire, and once below the knee, which made ampu tation necessary. Nevertheless, he returned to the front, though wearing a timber leg, and when then war was over was a colonel, at twenty-five.
